INTRODUCTION

In July 2016, the EU and Indonesia initiated negotiations for an EU-Indonesia Free Trade Agreement (FTA) with the 15th round of negotiations taking place between 10th and 14th of July 2023. Both parties seem eager to move towards concluding the trade deal. Given the increased commitments of the EU to Sustainable Development<sup>1</sup> provisions within FTAs, the spotlight remains on Indonesia's poor track record on labour rights.

This is even more important since recent legislative changes have moved the country away from alignment with ILO fundamental Conventions. Central in this move is the highly controversial Omnibus Law, Act 11 of 2020 on Job Creation Act, passed in October 2020. This law significantly decreases labour rights protections in the country and undermines working conditions, contrary to both the letter and spirit of fundamental international labour standards.

Context

A cornerstone in the EU's trade policy is its ambition to strengthen Trade and Sustainable Development (TSD) Chapters as set out in its new approach outlined in its recent Communication, the Power of Trade Partnerships. The EU aspires for more transparency, better involvement of civil society and effective enforceability of labour rights. From now on, stakeholders will be involved in all stages (including negotiations)<sup>2</sup>, there will be a specific gaps analysis<sup>3</sup>, more detail through roadmaps<sup>4</sup> and the possibility of trade sanctions as a matter of last resort, in instances of serious violations of ILO fundamental principles and rights at work<sup>5</sup>.

A signpost of future FTAs is the most recently concluded FTA with New Zealand, making transparency throughout the negotiation process a key priority. Civil society was informed throughout the process and will have a role in its implementation. Indeed, the agreement foresees stakeholder involvement at the national level as well as through a dedicated Joint Forum to oversee monitoring, including the trade elements of the agreement<sup>6</sup>.

Considering the increasing aspirations of the EU in terms of trade and sustainable development, the CEPA negotiations face increased challenges to deliver. On the one hand, the current negotiations have so far been characterized by an opaque process and limited stakeholder involvement. On the other hand, the adoption of the Omnibus Law by Indonesia makes it more difficult to achieve the TSD objectives. In addition, other trade-related issues also remain, such as Indonesia's unilateral ban on the export of nickel, restricting Europe's access to critical raw materials and greatly affecting production in the EU, such as on steel. At the request of European Trade unions, the EU took the issue to the WTO, which in turn stated that Indonesia's export ban was in violation to WTO rules.

The Omnibus Law, a flawed process

In October 2020, the Government and the House of Representatives of Indonesia passed an Omnibus Law, Act 11 of 2020 on Job Creation. This law replaces various existing laws touching upon different regimes on employment, investment, immigration, environmental standards, business licensing, and building permits<sup>7</sup>. However, this law is contested by Indonesian civil society and trade unions both on the process as well as on substance.

In developing the law, the government of Indonesia failed to consult and inform trade unions. Only in April 2020, the government invited trade unions in a tripartite consultation forum, but trade unions felt this action merely served to add legitimacy rather than conducting earnest dialogue in good faith.

Further to the lack of formal consultation on the Omnibus Law itself, the ETUC is concerned about the deteriorating political space for civil society and the right of freedom of speech following the excessive use of force by the police during peaceful assemblies and protests against the Job Creation Act in 2020<sup>8</sup>. The police used intimidation, violence and unlawful arrests and detentions against labour activists and human rights defenders. In March 2021, Nining Elitos, the chairwoman of an independent labour union called KASBI, was charged over alleged incitement and violations against health quarantine due to her participation in a demonstration to the Ministry of Manpower<sup>9</sup>.

Muhammad Yusri, KSBSI branch leader in Batubara District of North Sumatera was sentenced to 7 months in prison as a result of a protest rejecting the omnibus law that ended in riots in February followed by 5 month sentenced of two other leaders in the same region (Syahyunan and Putra Andi Nasution)<sup>10</sup>. Last year, during the May Day demonstration, hundreds of students were arrested for participating, despite having followed the instructions from the police<sup>11</sup>. The most recent protests<sup>12</sup> follow the reintroduction of the same law after it was defeated in the constitutional court.<sup>13</sup>

Deteriorating labour rights resulting from the Omnibus Law

Content-wise, the Omnibus Law weakens working conditions<sup>14</sup> and the more precarious conditions undermine workers' right to freedom of association and collective bargaining as laid out by ILO Conventions 87 and 98, both ratified by Indonesia. The Omnibus law has several flaws:

<sup>7</sup>The Law on Job Creation revised articles in several laws, namely Law No. 13/2003 on Manpower, Law No. 18/2017 on Foreign Workers, Law No. 40/2004 on National Social Security, Law No. 24/2011 on Social Security Agency, and enacted 4 implementing regulations, namely: Government Regulation 34/2021 on Foreign Workers, Government Regulation 35/2021 on Specified Time Work Agreement, Outsourcing, Working Hour and Rest, and Termination of Work, Government Regulation 36/2021 on Wages and Government Regulation 37/2021 on Job Loss Security

<sup>12</sup>Earlier, the government was criticised for not conducting adequate “public consultations” before passing the law. Recent legislation would change the definition of what constitutes a “public consultation” for passing of bills and also change procedures for passing omnibus-style bills in the parliament allowing it to include sections unrelated to the main framework of the bill (<https://peoplesdispatch.org/2022/06/17/indonesians-prepare-for-struggle-amid-re-introduction-of-anti-worker-omnibus-law/>)

- The Omnibus Law allows and stimulates the prolonged use of fixed-term contracts. Under the new Law,<sup>15</sup> fixed-term contracts may last up to five years instead of two. In addition, these contracts can be extended with another fixed-term contract, increasing the total possible term for fixed-term to ten years. And finally, the law eliminates the automatic transition from a fixed duration to a permanent contract and instead automatically terminates the contract at the end of the term, without prior notice by the employer.
- The new regulation clears the way for outsourcing workers in both core and non-core activities, whereas this was previously only possible in non-core activities. The ILO's international supervisory mechanisms and national courts have found repeatedly that such practice can lead to precarious working conditions, weakened associational rights, and can lead to exploitative labour conditions.
- Moreover, the new regulations increase the number of the maximum permitted overtime hours from three to four hours per day and from 14 to 18 hours per week. This new provision makes it possible for weekly working hours to exceed 58 hours, clearly going beyond the international standard set by the ILO.
- In terms of minimum wages, the new law significantly reduces the role of the Wage Council, resulting in a weakening of collective bargaining and consequently contrary to the ILO Minimum Wage Fixing Convention No. 131, 1970, which Indonesia has not yet ratified. Next to the weakening of the wage fixing mechanism at the country level, the new law also limits the possibility of lower bargaining at the district or sector level to set a higher wage than the provincial government. Finally, under the new law, small and micro businesses are exempt, thus effectively removing minimum wage coverage of 93% of those engaged in wage employment.<sup>16</sup> Consequently, the universality of a minimum wage is removed. Finally, the Omnibus Law decriminalizes the non-payment of minimum wage, thus significantly weakening enforcement.

CONCLUSION

The Omnibus Law significantly redesigned the rights of workers in Indonesia. According to the Government of Indonesia, the Law is essential to enlarge domestic employment, accelerate the development of Micro, Small, and Medium Enterprises (MSME), and eradicate corruption through simplifying and electronically integrating the permit system. However, in practice, the Omnibus Law violates International Labour Standards in several instances. Indeed, the law paves the way for excessive working hours, lower and unenforced minimum wages and fixed-term contracts and outsourcing becoming the new standard, thus undermining unionization, collective bargaining and social dialogue.

Trade Union position

The EU's ambitions to uphold labour rights are in contradiction with the current developments in Indonesia regarding labour rights, leaving workers in a more precarious situation. It becomes questionable when a trade agreement is being negotiated all the while severe deteriorations on international labour standards, especially ILO fundamental Conventions 87 and 98, social dialogue, freedom of speech and transparency are observable. The EU strives to secure the promotion of sustainability concerns through its trade policy. However, the Omnibus Law potentially undermines these commitments, weakening the CEPA. The EU trade policy must ensure full respect of human rights, including trade union and workers' rights and serve as a lever to foster decent wages and working conditions and not fortify the deterioration of these respective rights.

Trade Union demands

- 1 ETUC, therefore, calls on the European Commission to ensure the alignment of the CEPA with the ambitions of the new approach to Trade and Sustainable Development, to ensure the respect of international labour standards, especially the right of freedom of association and to collective bargaining.
- 2 The protection of freedom of association, freedom of expression and peaceful assembly must be guaranteed. Here, the ETUC especially calls on the Commission to address the shrinking political space, including the protection of freedom of expression, of peaceful assembly and the safety of labour union leaders and other human rights defenders as a matter of concerns in the negotiations.
- 3 The continuous transparency of the CEPA process is crucial. The ETUC calls to involve relevant stakeholders such as trade unions to be consulted during the CEPA negotiations<sup>17</sup>. Specifically, the ETUC calls to establish an EU-Indonesia Civil Society Dialogue to encourage bipartite/tripartite) social dialogue (workers, employers, governments), to promote decent work through closer cooperation, exchange of best practices and mutual learning as well as provide input into the negotiation process.
- 4 The required Sustainability Impact Assessments (SIA) and Human Rights Impact Assessments (HRIA) must be carried out as soon as possible, and not just before signing CEPA.

<sup>17</sup>As foreseen in Action Point (12) of the The power of trade partnerships

Indeed, CEPA is a test case to ensure the gaps analysis finds itself to an action-oriented, practical and accountable roadmap to ensure the non-regression as well as to positively address gaps.

- 6 In particular, Indonesia needs to ratify and respect in law and practice all ILO fundamental conventions before the signature of CEPA by the European Institutions. The CEPA agreement's contents must further support the implementation and enforcement of International Conventions, including fundamental ILO Conventions. CEPA should include clear and binding obligations to respect existing international labour norms, strengthen national labour legislation and foresee sanctions in the case of violations. Any lowering of ILO standards or regression in domestic legislation due to the negotiations or the conclusion of the CEPA agreement is unacceptable and should result in enforcement actions<sup>18</sup>.

- 7 Indonesia needs to improve their environmental and working standards throughout the global supply chain to ensure fair and sustainable trade, even when these relate to critical raw materials. The ETUC opposes any dumping of Indonesian products at artificially low prices on the EU open market, especially if the products are made in substandard environmental or social conditions. The ETUC insists that Free Trade Agreements should only be granted to third countries that respect high environmental and employment standards.
